On January 16, College Possible participated in a summit for increasing college access for low-income students at the White House. The summit brought together qualified representatives from organizations such as the National Economic Council, the Domestic Policy Council, and the Department of Education to have dialogue about the achievement gap and class disparities among college students and graduates.

"Education is one of the surest ways out of poverty," said College Possible associate director Bethany Krueger.

The organization announced their expansion strategy at the summit that would lead them to providing services in Philadelphia. "Philadelphia is our commitment to the President and the First Lady," said Krueger.

200 college presidents and some organizations throughout the country met at the summit to show full commitment to the mission of creating better college access.
